Under Attack: The GOP Advertising Assault on Swing State Dems.

Third Way

As the 2020 election results continue to roll in, it is clear that despite Democrats' success at the top of the ticket, some Republican attacks hit home down-ballot, denying Democrats the Senate and propelling losses in the House. Republicans hammered Democrats on a few key issues: tax increases, socialized medicine, defunding the police, supporting climate policies like the Green New Deal that would hurt the oil and gas industry, as well as generally being too liberal and controlled by the liberal establishment in Washington. While most of the candidates running in these competitive seats did not support Medicare for All, the Green New Deal, defunding the police, or other far-left policy ideas or bumper stickers, the ads repeatedly told voters that people who supported and bankrolled these candidates do. As much as many of the candidates in swing states and districts tried to paint themselves as independent and eager to work with anyone, Republicans were able to overwhelm too many of them by tying them back to Washington liberals and unpopular far-left tag lines.

Below are the publicly available attack ads that were run against competitive Democratic Senate candidates, Frontline Democratic House Members, and competitive Red-to-Blue House candidates who lost their races. The Red-to-Blue candidates included here were rated "Tossup" or "Lean-D" by the Cook Political Report, or they were in districts that Hillary Clinton carried in 2016 or that Joe Biden carried in 2020.

Conclusion

While these candidates ran strong campaigns, the election results showed that many of the ad nauseum attacks portraying them as part of the liberal establishment and supporting policies like Medicare for All, the Green New Deal, defunding the police, and raising taxes ultimately succeeded. It will be up to Democrats to look back at these attacks and shore up their defenses so they are less vulnerable in 2022.
